WHAT TO DO IN A FOOD ALLERGY EMERGENCY

If you have a severe food allergy , your doctor may have prescribed an emergency care kit . This kit contains a self-injectable dose of adrenaline (a substance that increases heart rate and blood pressure, and dilates the bronchial tubes). It is used in case of anaphylactic shock, without waiting for help.

If you have this type of emergency kit:

- Always keep it on you:

- Learn to recognize the first signs of a shock and to handle the care equipment on your own (using the training pen provided). The correct gesture is to position the pen on the outer edge of your thigh. Then press and hold the trigger button for ten seconds;
- Also inform those around you about the instructions for use of the equipment.

Medical supervision is required after any injection of adrenaline. Hospital care is therefore necessary if you have used your emergency kit. This follow-up also makes it possible to study the evolution of your food allergy in order to adapt your treatment if necessary.
